Abstract

Background: Cronobacter sakazakii is a Gram-negative bacterium that is capable of causing meningitis in infants. The aim of this study was to isolate and characterize virulent strains of Cronobacter sakazakii from food samples of Bangladesh.

Result: Six (6) Cronobacter sakazakii strains were isolated from 54 food samples on the basis of biochemical characteristics, sugar fermentation, S-layer protein profile and PCR of Cronobacter spp. specific genes (esak, gluA, zpx, ompA). These strains were found to have moderately high antibiotic resistance against cotrimoxazole, rifampin, gentamicin, and chloramphenicol. Most of the C. sakazakii isolates were capable of producing biofilm (100%), and were also found to be ESBL producer. Most of the C. sakazakii isolates were capable of producing cellular protease and siderophores, curlI expression, haemolysin, haemagglutinin, mannose-binding protein, and high cell surface hydrophobicity, significant resistance to human serum, can tolerate high concentration of salt, bile and DNase production. Most of them produced enterotoxins of different molecular weight. The isolates pose significant serological cross-reactivity with
